

Counting absentee ballots

Many people are choosing to vote using absentee ballots, which can also be called mail-in ballots, rather than in-person this year. Every state can have different terms for absentee ballots, deadlines for returning absentee ballots, and timelines for processing and counting those ballots. Processing ballots means checking signatures, checking voter identification, and/or otherwise preparing the ballot to be counted. Counting ballots means counting-up the number of votes for each candidate and sharing the totals with the public. It is important to understand that every state has a different timeline for processing and counting absentee ballots because, with more people than ever voting absentee, it may take longer for states to count all of the ballots they receive than in previous years. It also means that votes made with absentee ballots may matter more in the outcome of these elections than in previous years. Use this tool to learn when to return your absentee ballot in your state, how to track that ballot to make sure it arrived, and when your absentee ballot will be processed and counted.
